Nowadays a lot of young people move to live abroad. TV and the newspapers alarm that in the future Poland would transform into a land of old men. It is hard to blame the youngsters, the causes of their emigration are well-known truth. Moreover, it is hard to consider these kind of decisions in a cold-minded way, and it is also hard to judge it. Let's see the main advantages and disadvantages, then try to form a final statement.

Firstly, let's consider this problem from a view of a future emigrant. Salaries in Poland, comparing to the western countries are low, and it is not a hidden secret. The university's diploma does not always provide a good start on a job market. Furthermore, a lot of youngsters are charmed with a western countries living, here seems to them as a boring, dark and what is the most important hard existence. Finally, modern times are considered as the fastest era in the world's history. People should get used to living and working in different places through their whole lifetime, young people are not the exception. Also, the present way of thinking places your career on the first place, above the family or your motherland.

There are, obviously some drawbacks of the emigration, and there are plenty of them. The foreign culture barricade could be impossible to pass for someone who grew in Poland. The national integrity is a myth, there is still a lot of differences between for instance the Poles and the English.

Sometimes it is hard to adapt. Moving abroad also brings a big risk to your life. It is not said that immigrants in rich countries always find a well-paid job. It can be even worse – time pointlessly spent in foreign countries could be used in Poland to try your chances here. At last, but definitely not least the Poles are still familiar nation, it is hard for us to lose contact with our family or friends.

It is hard to make such a decision for everyone, I think. young man should look into his personal pros and cons carefully. I do not wish anybody to stand before this dilemma. The answer which says clear yes or no is impossible. Everyone should consider this decision on their own. All in all, it is a private matter.
